Democrats are desperate to make Donald Trump the next president — and at the same time are looking for ways to make him not president. Their second, and perhaps more fundamental, tactic is to try to ensure that he does not win 270 electoral votes in the Electoral College in November. This is the goal behind the Move On.org “Stop Trump” campaign, and others are following their lead. But their focus is wrong: It is not the Electoral College that should be on the Democrats' hit list. The goal should be to stop Trump from winning the election. That should be the Democrats' top priority, not the Electoral College. As I have argued before, the Electoral College is a good institution that has served the country well for years. It is true that Donald Trump could win the presidency despite a losing popular vote. He could win because Republicans dominate both the House and the Senate and because many states, Republican-controlled or not, give their Electoral College votes to whichever presidential candidate wins the popular vote. But that is not the way things actually work. In a direct popular election, Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton would both win about 45 percent of the vote. So their popular votes would be basically tied. But as we know, only certain states award their Electoral College votes to the popular-vote winner. States like California and New York would award their votes to Clinton in a direct election. But many states with smaller populations, such as Michigan, would allocate their Electoral College votes to Trump. That means that in a direct popular vote, Clinton would get well more than half of the Electoral College vote, but Trump would still win. That is not how the Electoral College works. (Except in one egregious case.) The Electoral College is just one of several ways a country governs itself. It is far better than direct democracy. But suppose the goal was not to stop Donald Trump from winning the presidency. Suppose the goal was to stop him from winning the presidency by winning the Electoral College. A strategy designed to achieve that goal would look like this: You have to win the popular vote in the states where you are strongest, and you can't depend on winning the Electoral College in the 09e8f5149f

If you want to watch live TV, no matter the place, you need to be a part of a certain area called the network. If you cannot make it, chances are you will see the following error message on your screen: "Connection timed out. Try again later". VPN even shields you from other computer users. How to use VPN? VPN uses a type of software commonly called a virtual private server. This server is used as a central access point where computers can connect to it. It can also route your traffic through an alternate location, for example, another location inside your own country, where the traffic can be much faster. VPN softwares are usually meant to be used on a desktop or laptop. If you choose to buy a VPN, you will need to buy the software and it will be installed on your device. This software can be installed on your computer or laptop. The main advantages of using it is that you can save money on other charges if you do it on the LAN at home, at school, or at work.
