Meat consumption has been described as an etiological factor of HPV related disease and the HPV cervix carcinoma. Human papillomavirus (HPV), a virus related to sexually transmitted diseases, is the principal cause of cervical cancer. The objective of this study was to correlate meat consumption and HPV infection and/or HPV related disease. The study was carried out in the city of Mexico, at a high risk region for the HPV related disease, with an important consumption of meat.

The study involved 495 women, aged 18 to 70 years old, who submitted three serum samples. All the participants were interviewed to record their socio-demographic characteristics, their consumption patterns of food, and the time of the last Pap test. The sera and Pap tests were sent to the laboratory for HPV tests. One hundred and thirteen women were infected with HPV, 58 with low-risk HPV and 55 with high-risk HPV. On the other hand, 96 of the women were infected with HPV on more than one occasion, 66 with low-risk HPV, and 50 with high-risk HPV. Six of the women were infected by HPV in more than one Pap test. The rate of HPV infection increased with age, from 23% (18-40 years) to 33% (41-50 years) and to 40% (51-70 years). The mean age of the women who did not have HPV (in any of the Pap tests) was 36.9 +/- 9.0 years. Only 41% had been taking the Pap test for 2 years or more. The percentage of HPV infection is higher among older women. The consumption of pork meat and high-risk HPV infection seem to be closely related, as well as being influenced by socio-economic and cultural factors. Primordial mean particle entropy evolution in near-critical D3-brane inflation. We propose a scenario of a primordial universe dominated by nearly constant mean particle entropy density, which is consistent with the current bound on the primordial non-Gaussianity. This is achieved by invoking a D3-brane gas inflation in which the temperature of the D3-brane is nearly constant during inflation. The energy density of the D3-brane is converted to particle
