Apraxia is a syndrome characterized by a peculiar disturbance of movement which is involuntary and apparently purposeless. The following tests are useful in the clinical practice: imitation of simple gestures which test sensorimotor integration; imitation of skilled movements testing cognitive integration; fluency tests which test both cognitive and motor integration; cancellation test. From these tests, five main syndromes can be distinguished: ideomotor apraxia, ideational apraxia, acalculia, acalculia and ideational apraxia. Patients with pure ideomotor apraxia show bradykinesia and absence of facilitation, those with ideational apraxia have a fluent paucity of gestures but do not show failure of facilitation. Many authors stress that apraxia is not a purely motor disorder, but includes a cognitive component. Four types of parietal lobe damage are recognized: left posteroinferior parietal lobe, left temporo-occipital junction, right parietal lobe and parieto-frontal conjunction. A pure motor disorder is not always accompanied by apraxia but the two disorders are frequently found in the same subjects. Moreover, a cortical-subcortical mechanism is postulated by many authors. Despite the heterogeneity of the clinical picture, apraxia is a result of an injury of the cortex or subcortical structures; the latter may affect the pathways which connect the parietal and frontal lobes. Intracortical connections seem to be particularly vulnerable.
