Hogan, having made many short films, called "doodles" (individual comic sketches, often linked to a film), had her first feature-length film premiere at the Toronto International Film Festival in 2003. Since then, she's directed more than two dozen shorts and pilots, and the short that became this film (which debuted at the Tribeca Film Festival, in 2009) had come to the Toronto festival with the tagline "It's not a movie, it's a smack in the face." The film was well-received for its smartness and for its treatment of three issues that it believes can't be addressed in any other way: taxes, immigration policy, and the fact that more young people have been incarcerated than served time. One of my favorite short films of the last year was Andrea Long Chu's "Ancillary Justice," which dealt with the issue of military detention of women who are pregnant. I found her treatment of that subject clever and careful. It gave me the same feeling I had when watching "The Tree of Life" (long before I knew the film would deal with the subject of childhood, death, and the construction of memory). One of the first films that really caught my attention after "Ancillary Justice" was "Esther." It's a movie that deals with immigration, but mostly its characters are struggling to pay their taxes, and so their story is very familiar to me. It's a movie that isn't trying to be shocking or profound. It's trying to be good. Esther is an undocumented youth who's in high school and is trying to navigate her way in this world, and the people she interacts with are just trying to live their lives. She doesn't want to be deported; she wants to find a family. "Esther
