Steroid hormones have profound effects on the nervous system, but our understanding of the details of their mechanisms of action is rudimentary. We propose to study the mechanism of action of steroid hormones on the regeneration of retinal ganglion cells (RGC). We will determine how steroid hormones affect the ability of CNS neurons to regenerate their axons through their cell bodies in the CNS. In many experiments, we will use the frog optic nerve as our model system because of the ease of visualization and manipulation of single axons in vitro. We will examine the effect of three steroid hormones (progesterone, corticosterone and testosterone) that affect RGC survival on the rate of regeneration of retinal ganglion cell axons over short distances (1-3mm). Our main hypotheses are: 1) that steroid hormones affect the rate at which axons regenerate; 2) that the ability of steroids to affect axon outgrowth is mediated by their ability to affect the extent to which regenerating axons cross the blood brain barrier; 3) that steroid hormones regulate axon outgrowth by modulating the expression of a gene that is known to play a major role in the maintenance of the growth cone. We will study how steroid hormones affect the growth cone of retinal ganglion cells by introducing them into the cell body and the regenerating axons of retinal ganglion cells and recording the activity of cells in the ganglion cell layer of the retina. The activity of the retinal cells that we record will be related to the position of the cell body or the axon in the optic nerve. This provides a basis for an analysis of the relative position of the cell body and the axon along their length. We can relate the position of axon-
