1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to the broadcasting of digital television signals, and more particularly, to the transmission of such signals in an efficient, flexible manner, while ensuring proper reception by the system end user.

2. Description of the Related Art Broadcasters generate video signals having a standard number of channels by transmitting the video and audio information for each channel in sequential "time slots," each time slot being a predetermined time period. In NTSC or PAL-type digital TV systems, for example, six or eight time slots of video and audio information are transmitted each second for approximately twenty seconds. Most TV's available in the marketplace include means for selecting channels by frequency, based on the particular system, e.g. NTSC or PAL. The number of channels is usually limited to 100 or 200 by the selection technique. The digital television signal generated by a broadcaster will typically include a plurality of successive fields, each field including the video information of a single time slot. Each field may consist of a preamble, timing pulse and a plurality of video and audio lines. The video and audio information associated with successive fields, for example, is divided into packets or groups of packets. In general, video and audio information is divided into packets in accordance with a system-specific packet pattern. Generally, a basic concept used in the transmitting of a digital television signal has been to divide the basic data stream into the number of programs desired to be broadcast in an environment where the digital data stream is communicated in real time, i.e., in a non-compressed manner. Each program of video information has been separated into packets. Each packet is encoded, for example, using run length encoding to take advantage of statistical redundancy. In general, the packets of a particular program are encoded separately and later placed together to form

With the help of his girlfriend/manager Kat, the duo successfully swindle a bank employee into unwittingly giving them the keys to the vault. Once inside, they locate the coins and take them back home. The next day, Kat locks Tony up in a closet and simulates the break-in, scaring him with the smell of her body since he'd earlier claimed that he married her in a do-it-yourself wedding last night. Knowing he's vulnerable, she decides to steal the coins again. Kat reconvenes with the couple and has them drop off the gold coins at two nearby pawn shops to add more confusion to the commotion. After Tony is released, their plan is foiled when both pawn shops' owners discover the gold and lead them to a boarded-up building, the location of the "missing" gold. They meet a mortally injured Bruce who just wanted a piece of the gold coins. He tells the pair to go door-to-door at various pawn shops, but he finds all of the doors locked. Tony takes the extra coins he'd gathered along the way, and the pair continue to treat each other badly as the heist drags on. Just as Kat's empathy for Tony is starting to wear off, they arrive at a bank where they discover that the local gold shop is open and all of the employees have left. Kat then asks Tony to cover up the crime, and he feigns ignorance and drives off after taking his girlfriend's bike. At the end of the day, in a chase to
