Introduction {#sec0005} ============ Pseudomembranous enterocolitis caused by Panton-Valentine leukocidin (PVL) producing Staphylococcus aureus or other methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) strains is a severe disease. The incidence of skin and soft tissue infections (SSTI) due to MRSA is increasing worldwide.[@bib0030], [@bib0035] We describe a patient with SSTI due to MRSA carrying the PVL gene. Case report {#sec0010} =========== A 66-year-old male Caucasian was admitted with a painful ulcerated lesion in the right leg. According to the patient, he had used a hard blunt object to the right leg during a previous football training session. A presumptive diagnosis of a soft tissue infection was made, and the patient was initially treated with cefazolin. During the admission, the patient showed signs of sepsis. After blood cultures showed no growth, a triple antibiotic regimen with amoxicillin/clavulanic acid and piperacillin/tazobactam was started. On the fifth hospital day, the clinical condition of the patient had improved and the infection was finally cleared. During the admission, a purulent discharge from the lesion was observed and MRSA with the resistance to methicillin (MIC = 2 μg/mL) was isolated. A pigmented penicillin-binding protein (PBP) 2′ and 3′ homologue 2 was detected in the isolate by polymerase chain reaction (PCR). The isolate was also positive for Panton-Valentine leukocidin (PVL) and the adhesin protein (AT-A) genes. The infection was suspected to be a MRSA soft tissue infection. Vancomycin or teicoplanin treatment was started, but the patient needed to switch to vancomycin due to allergic reactions to teicoplanin. The patient was still febrile in the seventh hospital day, and Acinetobacter lwoffii was isolated. An isolate resistant to ciprofloxacin was also found in blood cultures. After three weeks of hospitalization, the patient was transferred to a peripheral hospital and discharged with ciproflox
