Unlike most other games available, players create their own content for Roblox and can make it public or private. Previously, players simply used the game's available tools to create their own content, including building environments, characters, weapons, and game objects. Now, players can add and edit programming code to these basic elements. With hundreds of thousands of programming skills to draw from, players can create any type of content they want. For those that don't want to build their own games, there are also over 100 games available for download that come ready-made from Roblox's game repository. Every day, new games are available to play and users can download or play free, including party games, racing games, action games, horror games, sports games, puzzle games, and sports shooting games. Players can use Robux to purchase items or to give gifts to other players. They can also use InWorldz (an in-game chat service that is separate from the game client) to privately communicate. Games can be set to specific "playlists" and players can block other players. Roblox also offers player-to-player challenges and tournaments. The programming language: Roblox is built around a programming language called "Game Logic Script", which was developed by David Baszucki. Game Logic Script is a single-file scripting language that compiles down to a set of machine code and operates close to real-time, allowing game logic to be highly sophisticated and reactive without crashing. The Lua programming language is included as a pre-processor. Game Creation, How does it work: There are two ways to create a game for Roblox. Players can create their own content, with or without the use of Lua and Game Logic Script. Alternatively, players can download ready-made games from the game repository. Ready-made games are created by developers in-house or are a collaborative effort of several developers. These are fully functional and can be played without any modification. Recent research indicates that children as young as age four and five use language skills to learn about the world. In the last several years, research has shown that young children master a number of distinct aspects of language. They understand the syntax of an utterance, they use the semantics of words to recognize that what they say is about something, and they use information contained in the syntax, or text, of an utterance to help them predict the content of the utterance. For example, when children hear "The Mommy is coming home," they are able to recognize that the word "Mommy" is a noun and the word "coming" is a verb. The fact that children understand that the noun "Mommy" is the object of "comes" is not explicitly taught to them; instead, they infer it from the words used by the teacher, and they infer it by their own efforts to relate the word "Mommy" to the word "coming." For example, when asked to describe the action of "coming," they might add the action of "moving" to what they already know about "Mom
