The new mobile hotspots are capable of supplying a MiFi-like coverage for up to eight devices at one time, according to T-Mobile. There's no mention of calling or text out, but it's possible the hotspots could double as a port-connected Wi-Fi device. The hotspots include 2,000 MB of data, which apparently don't count against T-Mobile data allotment. They also include a Bluetooth and WiFi 2.4 GHz access point, and T-Mobile will throw in a free month of service. Like T-Mobile's existing MiFi service, the new hotspots are a bit of a hassle to use, requiring the user to download the Wi-Fi app and a series of tools to connect them to a T-Mobile phone account. Still, it's a better alternative to using a standard router. T-Mobile will start offering the new hotspots for free in the near future, but don't get your hopes up that the service will be a permanent fixture. I imagine T-Mobile will eventually tie it into more of its other offerings, and charge for it at some point. But now that T-Mobile has demonstrated that it can provide Wi-Fi access for a large number of users with a set of inexpensive devices, we can probably expect to see more of this type of device in the future.News St. Paddy's Day party to
