As a separate study, the effect of the addition of α-tocopherol to an already existing feed mix of tocopherol sources was evaluated in pigs ([@pone.0235833.ref028]). In this study, diets containing high α-tocopherol as well as isolated sources of synthetic tocopherols or a combination of alpha-tocopherol and natural tocopherol were fed to pigs from 7 days old to slaughter weight. Pigs fed a combination of α-tocopherol and natural tocopherol displayed a daily weight gain of 0.23 kg and a feed conversion ratio of 1.29, compared to 0.16 and 1.43, respectively, for the groups fed natural tocopherol-only or α-tocopherol-only diets. These results indicate that adding α-tocopherol from a natural source to an already existing tocopherol-enriched diet, in addition to the previously stated potential benefits of feeding a natural source to pigs, may benefit them. The higher overall weight gain observed in pigs fed the diet supplemented with α-tocopherol, together with the feed conversion and nitrogen retention results, indicate that β-tocopherol supplements have a positive effect on the nutrient utilization of pigs. In the present study, the addition of β-tocopherol to the diets led to slight reductions in the weight of pigs at weaning and their final body weight. This effect was not observed in the previous study that employed the same feeding regimen; this suggests that tocotrienols may have additive or antagonistic effects on the body weight of pigs depending on the dietary and physiological conditions of the animals ([@pone.0235833.ref030]). This finding is supported by the reduction in the total weight of abdominal organs observed for pigs fed with α-tocopherol compared to those fed with

Jane's Blog The History of Absence Whether it's a friend or a family member who has had cancer, none of us should be immune to the feelings of hurt and the lasting impact of the absence that cancer brings into our lives. I've witnessed some of the hardest wounds to heal – wounds that we have little ability to influence, but it doesn't stop us from trying. Cancer comes in all sizes, shapes, ages and cultures, and our thoughts and prayers go out to all of the people affected by cancer. Absence breeds absence. Long ago, a group of people had a chance meeting. They said hello, shared a brief conversation about their place in the world and went their separate ways. However, it didn't take long for the deep wound of absence to surface. This is a story about absence. This is a story about the pain of loss and a story about the power of love. It's easy to lose someone when you're a child, a teenager or even an adult. You feel their absence more acutely – you miss their presence, their hugs, their laughs, their jokes – you miss them. However, when someone you love has cancer, your sense of absence becomes more intense. When you were a child, you had a mum or a dad who was always there to take care of you. Suddenly you were on your own, in your own house. When your mum or dad had cancer, they weren't present to you as they normally were. You missed their smiles, their hugs and their sense of humour, and you missed them. When your mum or dad had cancer, you learnt to love them in a different way. You never quite knew where they were in their body or in their mind, but you knew their strength and their courage. You learnt to love them at a deeper level, because you learnt to accept them, you learnt to respect them. Absence breeds absence. Years later, I was working in a 6d1f23a050
