What's new:

Inevitably, and despite my best efforts, memories of childhood torture my professional life. One of the enduring elements of my childhood is deep social anxiety, and this extreme anxiety resurfaces when I am extremely stressed, or have been away from home for a long time, or am travelling, or am in the presence of strangers or people I don't know well. Although I know this is a commonly-seen problem with a lot of people, and am glad to know there are treatments for this kind of anxiety, some of the memories of my past have also come back to haunt me. About ten years ago, a little over one year after moving to Vienna, I started worrying about Geocaching, an activity that involves hiding small trinkets (called caches) in well-hidden, readily-searched places. The initial hike-in for some caches near the House of the Future Museum (Wiener Haus des Fortschritts) in Lower Austria was several hours in length, so I started looking for caches that were in towns or on foot paths where my first home, Graz, was a short car ride away. When I returned to my flat there would be new caches on my apartment door (which I would fiendishly open and hide) that I would have to reserve a spot to find, and perhaps bring back. As a beginner, I would experience a huge and overwhelming fear at the idea that a stranger would see a logbook with a cache number on it. I did not think for one minute that I would not be found out and returned to the real world, a place I did not and still do not consider to be safe. I remember the times I spent taking that long drive to my home because I was afraid I wouldn't be safe if I went out on my own after dark. And I remember being annoyed by the fact that my fears were so silly and that there was no reason to be afraid at all. That went on for a long time; even now, when alone in my flat with the lights off, there may be some anxiety I have to fight before finding the courage to leave the apartment. One night, less than a year into settling into Vienna, I was home alone and decided to conduct some computer games, quietly. I had gotten the urge to replay Monster Hunter Generations, a game with a lot of monster crawling around in narrow corridors that was quite impossible to navigate without running if you didn't have a fanboy's determination
