Once you obtain access to your system, you can visit any link you want and if you like the article you can download it. Exposure to a variety of different high-energy particles and radiation, such as cosmic rays and neutrons, is dangerous for astronauts. This is because particles such as radiation from cosmic rays, that are found in space, cause damage to cells in the body and are the leading cause of cancer. Because of these dangers, spacecraft have crash escape systems and radiation shielding on the outside of the vehicle, as well as radiation monitoring and dosimetry systems, to limit the amount of radiation to which the astronauts are exposed. Cosmic rays and solar radiation interact with the spacecraft's material, converting it to secondary particles. These particles vary in size from electrons and protons to short-lived. These particles can be stopped by the spacecraft's shielding. This journal includes published peer-reviewed literature and abstracts for congresses held during the year.
