It appears here as part of the Climate Desk collaboration. In 1999, an 800m-square region of space nearly 10 million miles from the Earth was captured by the Hubble Space Telescope. From its location in the outer fringe of the Solar System, the area was a complete mystery. It was designated in the Hubble's field of view as a star, and dubbed the cepheid variable star IC 4996. In 2015, astronomers discovered that a single companion orbiting this star posed an unprecedented opportunity for understanding our galaxy. The star is Earth's twin, a star that sits two-and-a-half times further away than its closest planetary neighbour, Neptune. It's also of an entirely different type, belonging to a class that is rare in the galaxy. The discovery from the European Southern Observatory (ESO), at the La Silla Paranal Observatory in Chile, was made by combining two of the world's most powerful telescopes, ESO's Very Large Telescope (VLT) and the Hubble. "A very close-in planet around a star is a real rarity," said Hendrik Vereecken, an astronomer at the European Southern Observatory. "The fact that a cepheid - which can be used to measure the distance to stars - is a planet host is a tremendous bonus." The planet, known as WASP-33b, orbits so close to its star that the top of its atmosphere would reach 100 times the boiling point of water. WASP-33b is slightly smaller than Jupiter, with a mass of 2.2 times that of Jupiter. The resulting gravity ripens the planet to such an extent that it is three times denser than water. The discovery is a first in the field of exoplanet science and reflects a new capability of telescopes: previously, it was the size of the telescope that influenced the size of the planet observed and consequently the discovery potential. The European Southern Observatory's new facility, the Very Large Telescope Interferometer (VLTI), provides the astronomical equivalent of the human eye, allowing for discoveries in small and faint worlds. "For the first time, we can detect something that's comparable in mass with the Earth," V
