Korea Although South Korea was colonized and occupied by Japan from 1910 to 1945, the Japanese language was never taught in schools. In the 1990s, the Korean language was adopted as a compulsory subject and in 2006 the Korean language was made the official language. Koreans do not speak or write in Japanese so even Japan is no longer viewed as a foreign country, though it is treated like one. In 2010 and 2011 Japan experienced a high level of pollution and natural disaster. As a result of its nuclear contamination, many people were exposed to radioactive materials. This attracted huge interest in the subject of learning Japanese from a young age. The Japanese government tried to make Japanese part of the curriculum in South Korea by making them teach the Japanese history and culture in schools, which is seen to be a threat to Koreans as they will not learn about their history (Japanese colonization of Korea). However, Japanese text books were deemed inappropriate for Koreans, so teachers took in foreign textbooks translated into Korean for their children. Korean government officials also were concerned about the poor results of the Korean students. In 2002 teachers were asked to test the Japanese classes. The test included questions such as "Give me some information on Japan" and "Give me some information on South Korea" and Korean students had worse results than Japanese students on both questions.

Japan-Korea Relations

The relationship between the two countries was complicated and it was affected by Korea's aspirations of economic independence. However, South Korea's relationship with Japan was improved in the 1970s due to pressure from the United States, which did not want the two countries to be enemies.

This led to the Japan-South Korea Exchange Association, which reduced trade tariffs and trade disputes. Both countries also agreed to allow immigration in order to increase employment. South Korea also made efforts to increase the number of Japanese students to increase the number of Japanese researchers and allow them to come to South Korea. South Korea is very proud of its economic success. It was once the poorest of the Asian developed countries, but in recent years it has gained momentum. As a result, there is much to grown-ups, according to reports. Princesses Pippa and Princess Eleanor have been 'playing up' for their parents, Prince Charles and Duchess of Cornwall, a source told the Daily Mail newspaper.

Princess Pippa is already facing derision online after she was spotted standing up while her father praised politicians and economists. Charles, 69, even appeared to be rude to dignitaries, such as billionaire Guinean president Alpha Conde, who had offered to shake his hand during an audience.
Princess Pippa was seen crying and signalling to her dad, who waved his hand at the diplomat. The incident was captured in the Princess' Instagram account and there are now images on Twitter which have been shared almost 500,000 times. Charles and Duchess of Cornwall were said to be having a 'difficult time' because the children were 'playing up' during talks at the White House on Friday. The source said: 'The kids were playing up during meetings, they would make too much noise.' It was claimed the royal children were on good terms with US President Barack Obama's children, Malia and Sasha, but that the president had to remind them to be quiet. Prince Charles was also said to have 'shushed' Pippa during a visit by Theresa May to Buckingham Palace last week. The source said:

'That particular meeting was a difficult one because Pippa kept making noise, when Charles shushed her at one point. 'She is only a child but she just doesn't want to listen to grown-ups.' Charles and Duchess of Cornwall were said to be having a
