1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to the field of semiconductor device manufacturing. More particularly, the present invention relates to the field of electron beam enhanced semiconductor patterning. 2. Description of Related Art Integrated circuits often include a vast number of semiconductor devices.

For example, a semiconductor device may include more than 100,000 semiconductor devices. The semiconductor devices, which may be transistors, capacitors, diodes, resistors, inductors, etc., are formed on a semiconductor substrate according to design. The semiconductor devices are interconnected to implement a specific electrical function. Many integrated circuits are fabricated on a semiconductor wafer. Generally, the wafer is scribed or cut in order to separate individual integrated circuits from one another. A semiconductor die can be singulated from a wafer and packaged to provide a semiconductor device. In a conventional scribing process, a diamond blade can be used to mechanically cut the wafer along scribe streets. The scribe streets can be formed in a metal layer or in the semiconductor substrate below the wafer. Conventional techniques used to separate or singulate semiconductor die can be a time-consuming and costly operation, especially when large numbers of semiconductor die are to be singulated from the wafer. Moreover, the number of defects introduced into the semiconductor die during the scribing process can be excessive. In addition, the conventional scribing process can produce rough edges along the scribe streets on the semiconductor die. These rough edges may cause stress cracks, which can propagate through the semiconductor die and cause it to become nonfunctional.
