Opening Photoshop The Top Left panel in the window will always display the current size of the window, as well as its position within the design environment. In the photo on the left, the window was zoomed and offset from the actual window size. Clicking the icon at the top left will open a flyout menu of options. The 4 options that I see most often are: View Menu These options are to help you quickly open and close windows, and view and zoom in and out. * Featured Art* Featured Video Menu Roseline Maarouf Roseline Maarouf's work dives into the thorny realities of the Middle East, no matter how familiar they are to westerners. Her themes of fall from grace, and the repeating images of a castrated man, seem to express the fierce restlessness and hope of women. Despite the violence and state of repression, she shows her optimism for change. "Roseline Maarouf I do not see myself as an artist. I am an artist," Roseline Maarouf said when she spoke about her works. "I have always been in love with this profession." Her family is from Lebanon, and she was born and raised in Lebanon. "I do not see myself as an artist," Roseline Maarouf said when she spoke about her works. "I am an artist," As her work has evolved, she has begun to acknowledge more the ways she has been shaped by the social constructs of her environment. Her art is a form of expression of her life and experiences. The Lebanese terrain has had an immense impact on her art. Lebanon is a country that has been shaped by conflict since its birth. It's independence was gained only in 1943, after intense conflict with France and Britain over the Ottoman Empire. France lost its appetite for colonial domination, and Britain was so shaken by its defeat in the First World War it relinquished its position on the Mediterranean. These two European states were the colonial powers, and this the initial issue that sparked conflict between the French and the British. These colonial interests have shaped the mentality of people, and they have endured. Her work is powerful and critical. It is not only the struggles she faces that resonate, but the empathy she seems to have towards all people. Her work has a hopefulness in it and even though there is sadness, she does not wallow in it, but rather she moves forward and uses it as a starting point to make things better. The imagery she uses speaks of her own story and that of women in her country and throughout the region. She has a concept of women's yearning and a need to try and find meaning in life. Her imagery is charged with emotion. She draws on a deep understanding of her own experiences and those of women in her society. She draws all that is universal, and universal to every culture. "
