Recently, base station systems have begun to use light-emitting diodes (LEDs) for both providing backlight and user interface information to the wireless device.

These LEDS are more energy-efficient than incandescent or fluorescent lights, thus providing for longer battery life. Moreover, due to their compact size, LEDs have very low profiles, which can make them particularly useful in many types of displays, such as those used in laptop computers. The LEDs used for providing backlight are generally driven using constant current. Since the LEDs vary in efficiency, depending upon the current they are driven at, a constant current requires that the LED is constantly dissipating power to maintain a desired backlight level. In light of these advantages, some LED drivers may include discrete LED drivers at each of their constituent LED loads. The discrete LED loads may be able to provide the same functionality of the LED driver, without the potentially complex and power-inefficient circuitry within the LED driver. For example, such an LED driver may use pulse-width modulation (PWM) to drive a string of LEDs, thus eliminating the need for a constant current source and thereby eliminating the waste of power associated with constant current. Other circuit configurations, such as buck converters, may also provide a more efficient drive for an LED.

An LED driver may have a different configuration for generating a backlight signal to power the various LED load devices. For example, the backlight signal
