It's easier than you might think—but sometimes, you just need to be a bit more resourceful. The Hidden Wiki is a website that attempts to downrank a range of searches with codes hidden inside the page. The idea is that the codes will highlight the different pages in the results, some of which won't be indexed by Google and will be downranked. This can be used to trick Google and other search engines into displaying unindexed pages in order to tell you how unimportant they really are. The site currently has around 200 pages, and comes in a few varieties. There's a "classic" type that allows you to add a simple hexadecimal code to a page, and then watch as Google-bot botches the code and scores your page lower than it should be. There's also a "Google Docs" category that allows you to create your own, secret codes and assign them to your favorite pages. This is probably the most fun, as it lets you figure out precisely how to downrank a page with Google using a custom code of your own creation. Finally, there's the "Crypto-troll" category, which contains pages in various languages, with different kinds of codes. These pages offer instructions in German, Polish, and even Chinese for how you can try to trick Google and see what level of downranking you can achieve. Regardless of how you manage to trick Google into giving you more relevant results, it's nice to be able to do so with a quick bit of ingenuity. Sadly, it won't work for everything, as you can't just put text onto a page
