FRANCE. These.Sewing up the end of something--'Allowing the World to Decide': A Literature Review on ending pregnancy care in India. Childbirth is often a joyous event, yet often it is also a stressful one as an unintended pregnancy or an abortion is not readily accepted by families in India. As a result, many pregnant women fail to seek antenatal care, and when they do they often receive poor quality services. The family, especially the husband, often becomes the 'decision maker' with regard to the fate of the pregnancy and the end of the care is often left to the individual woman herself. While most literature on ending pregnancy in India is confined to the Indian context, we have reviewed the literature to identify common themes and to facilitate comparisons with other developing countries. The literature is mostly anecdotal and the lack of data and access to women's voices reduces the ability to truly understand what is happening on the ground, but there is a growing trend towards documenting the psychological well-being of women and the needs of the men in seeking ways to end pregnancy. We explore the legal, cultural and policy factors that may impact on how a woman decides to end her pregnancy. We also explore possible consequences of individual and social factors on abortion. Abortion care depends on the woman, the family and the communities, not the government, and it is the woman's voice that needs to be heard most, even if the decisions are often made in the shadow of the law. The time has come to change the direction of planning for safe abortion care in India and to ensure that the voice of the woman is heard to end this stigmatisation of the health care provider.
