can do a lot more than just navigate, including make voice calls to mobiles, answer. 4 Answers 4 All that actually matters is that a person becomes a parent. The process of realizing that you're a parent is what happens in your mid-thirties. You have kids, and your next challenge is dealing with the emotional impact of having that responsibility. That's why - when you're a few months older than thirty - you'll hear stories of women giving birth well before 30, and it's common for someone like you to tell a friend that you really want a baby now. It's just a feeling that happens to you. What other stuff comes along with being a parent is secondary to the important event. People who become a parent don't realize it until they have kids. It's not a magic switch. @Jadaliel Being a parent is the most important thing in the world to me. I have had the mother of my child here with me from the first day. I have never let her go without the knowledge and experience of being a mother. She has helped me to so many things.

Both mom and I are very very fortunate. My child is healthy, secure and very much loved. I feel like one of the luckiest people. - TulioMar 18 '12 at 15:38 That all being said you can look at it from a flip side perspective.

That is when you look at a mother. When that goes through a child's head, you can't help but think you're the luckiest person in the world
