1. The light version of the installer will now install an entry in the registry specifying that the ISO can be accessed through a removable media, a network drive, or the local disk. This means that you can also choose to install it to a USB flash drive (this feature will be present only in the RedPill version) That pesky /dev/sda may actually be a bug in the syno kernel. According to the IdxMap it should NOT present itself at the first spot grrr... we set it to map controller 1 to like 20 and it still used the first disk (and only the first) at /dev/sda. There may be a way to use remap of ports (another feature which syno uses extensively on their boards) to move it. It would actually explain why syno uses a long string of remaps (comically long, like 30-entries-long) instead of a map on some of their boards... as map seems to not work properly. Microsoft is even adding an option to set the computer name as you complete the setup in this new version. The option to create an online account is now buried inside the Sign in options page, and when setting up Windows 11 Home, users will be required to have an internet connection, and they will be forced to create an account with a Microsoft account. However, theres a workaround to skip the requirement and continue with an offline account. In practice, the entire redpill-core repository contains the list of all apps that are supported out of the box. There are some that may work on Windows 8.1 and even on Windows 10, but not everyone is happy with Windows10. Most of the community fork or package drivers, or develop their own drivers. Among those, there is a lot of desktop specific stuff. A lot of 3D, screen capture (`obrazek`) etc.
