Can the Hawks hold their top line down to keep the 2nd line out of the scoring column? Or will they be able to keep the best line in the game to a minimum in scoring? So far, the Hawks have been much better than I predicted. I'm not concerned about the lack of scoring at all. While I expected the 4th line to be shut down by the 2nd, it has played a more important role. I think the 4th line is the most valuable unit on this team right now. It's getting the puck deep, it's getting it back into the offensive zone quickly and causing turnovers. Obviously the Hawks are a team that doesn't like to give up the puck, but it can be done if you're diligent with your coverage and aggressive enough in the defensive zone. This team is not a "me" team by any means, so it's nice to see that the 4th line has been important. Now onto the 2nd line. The problem with this line is that they can't play a physically strong role on the ice. They can only rely on their speed to get them out of trouble and generate scoring opportunities. The 3rd line has been relatively quiet, but since the Hawks haven't been able to keep a high scoring pace, it's not a surprise. However, the 2nd line hasn't really done much offensively for the Hawks. Their best scorers are the 4th line (three goals and an assist from Justin Falk), but they're only averaging 2.5 shots per game and only 4.4%
