If you don't need the "Finish" feature at this moment, nothing much will happen if you close a project. You won't lose anything. If you're not using 'the finish feature,' you need to know it's used when closing a project. Otherwise, you will lose many things. However, there's no way to automatically close projects, which makes it not much of a feature at all. Adobe Photoshop will now allow you to add a Linked Directory (that is, a trigger map, if you will) to a directory inside of Adobe Bridge or Catalog folder. The idea is to create an XMP (encoded in the template) that is extracted by XMP Tools software and used as a link to the file you want. That way, you will not have to locate the XMP in the whole of your archives, but only in the directory where the files is located. This is useful for reference, but it's still not quite perfect — every time you move a file inside that directory, it would have to create a new XMP file and it will make your directory really large. You may be familiar with a feature introduced in Lightroom called Smart Whites. It is a tool that allows you to 'click' on the featured white point of your image - decide where you want your whites to be located, and the program will automatically adjust the whites of the image to match that spot. This tool makes excellent work for Photoshop users, and uses Adobe Camera RAW properties (for color, particular WB, etc). Lightroom allows you to navigate this feature using a chevron, or "smart ring" that contains that tool. The idea is to click on your image, and a white circle would appear around your selection point.

The printed product is a part of the graphic, logo design on a small business card, poster, business card, business, or even the online store itself. The quality of the print instructs how the customer feels when they receive a piece of business card or the order in his mailbox. The quality of print, the type of paper, and the print job is printed by the printer of the shop. Most of the places provide a type of print designing on the day of the order or sometimes the customer can choose the text. Some of the clients ask for custom print jobs or a type of design stamped with a logo. The quality of a printer or print shop can be measured by the first impression when clients receive their order for its quality. Because the majority of business cards or the order is framed and placed in the wall, well-crafted cards or orders would have that definition. Clients who love printed products are willing to spend more on quality graphic prints. In this part of Photoshop, you can filter, edit and design many effects such as the stone, oil, or solvent.
