Chimeric monoclonal antibody directed at human urokinase-type plasminogen activator displays antitumor activity in vivo. A monoclonal antibody (MOC-33-12) was generated by immunization of mice with human urokinase-type plasminogen activator (hu-PA) and has an IgG2b isotype. To explore the application of this monoclonal antibody for tumor treatment, we evaluated its antitumor effect in vivo. We confirmed that this antibody has high specificity for hu-PA, but not for plasminogen or urokinase-type plasminogen activator receptor. This MOC-33-12 significantly inhibited hu-PA-mediated plasminogen activation in vitro. Treatment of a human squamous cell carcinoma cell line (UT-15MG) with MOC-33-12 resulted in a complete arrest of tumor cell growth in vivo in both subcutaneous and intranasal xenograft models. Furthermore, the antitumor effect of this antibody was dependent on PA expression in tumor cells. The effect was not only the result of complement-dependent cytotoxicity (CDC), but was also partially dependent on the induction of antibody-dependent cellular cytotoxicity
