After researching my options, I decided to stick with the Creative Cloud plan. That means also paying for Photoshop Creative Cloud, Lightroom CC and Lightroom Web. All of the software is integrated with compatible digital cameras. In fact, Lightroom can now also directly import photos from iPhones, making all the integration more seamless. A few of the first impressions I have are:

- Via FreeForm Text: This will paste text into the current image, and it's useful for adding labels to non-destructive assets. It also lets you resize, but consider that InDesign's Type tool has some of its own good features, such as kerning and tight alignment. This function might be useful if you have a logo you want to add to a photo, but you couldn't figure out how to add text. FreeForm Text lets you do that.
- Via Exported Metadata: If you use Lightroom (or Elements), you can export metadata to photos and other files, then import it back into Photoshop in order to add information about an image (e.g., keywords, copyright information, exposure information, etc.).
- Luminance: This helps separate a red, green, and blue channel. It's similar to Adobe Color Mask, which does essentially the same, but color masks are more difficult to use. Luminance is a simple black-and-white overlay that you can easily adjust, and remove, after adjusting.
- ReSharper IDE functionality - This tool allows you to right click on objects or keywords and add refactorings to them. Before, you had to drop the properties from the refactoring bar, and that was clunky. Clicking on this adds a refactoring to the object and it shows up on the refactoring bar.
